

Lily DesJardins
Vinal Technical High School
Middletown, CT

Everyone has dreams, hopes, and expectations for the future. Some people, like Dr. King, have famous dreams. He dreamt about his children's future and the future the entire country. He was hoping for a better, bright future. He hoped for freedom, emotionally and mentally, not just in writing somewhere in the government records. African Americans may have earned the right to be humans, but they never really get freed from the mental prison they were forced into. By forcing African Americans to use different bathrooms, schools, water fountains from White Men, we forcing them to believe they were lesser people. And that is why MLK had a dream. He dreamt to fix that. He wanted a better home for his children, and his children's children. He wanted to let them all feel safe in the country which they would call home.

I think that today MLK will be disappointed in how things have progressed. Yes, segregation ended for the most part, but there is still police brutality, and when he was growing up the 'N' word was a bad name to be called, yet kids today use it as a term of endearment. I also think that not only would he be disappointed about how things have progressed for African Americans, but he would be disappointed about all the putting down of anyone. His goal, dream, was to have peace and happiness among all men. At the time he was referring to the fact that we were being separated by color of our skin, but the idea at the time about LGBTQ+ and other minorities had not come up. So I believe he would be disappointed about how the work he put into this country has progressed.

I dream too. I dream about righteousness for all. I hope to fix everything, event though that may not be a goal within reach for me. I can do what I can to make things right on small scales. I want people to be educated. So many Americans are uneducated about things such as LGBTQ+ problems, or women's rights, or small things in little states. People are uneducated about poverty or how they can make a change. So many people offer up charity around the holidays, but what about the rest of the year? People still need help the rest of the time. It is hard for people to recognize when someone is in trouble or when someone is seeking help. I just wish I could help people see that they can make a difference. If people knew the difference they could make, then maybe, just maybe, the entire ideal of people might change, making life better for even a small amount of people. So many people are more worried about technology or social media, yet others cannot even afford technology, because whatever money they can scrape up goes to food or clothes in order to stay warm during winter.