Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is remembered for working to ensure that all people are treated equally. He dreamed of a world where everyone, regardless of their race, would be judged by their character and not their appearance. Being an American Sikh, Dr. King's message resonates with me deeply because it reflects the values I was taught in my culture.

In Sikhism, children are expected to keep their hair tied up in a bun, which is often covered by a turban. My appearance is different from that of a typical American boy, but I have always been fortunate to feel included, whether in school, sports, or in everyday life. I have never faced discrimination based on my looks, and I believe this is due to Dr. Martin Luther King's work.

Dr. King always followed Mahatma Gandhi's teachings of nonviolence protests. His dream of a world where people of different races and backgrounds can live together peacefully is something I want to help make a reality. I believe we can create a world where no one is judged by their race, religion, or appearance, but by their actions and character. I plan to start a club at my middle school to promote awareness and understanding of different religions and cultures. I hope to create a space where students can learn about diversity and respect one another's differences. This vision is not just important to me as an American Sikh, but also as someone who deeply cares about making the world a better place. Dr. King's work encourages me to stand up for fairness and kindness in all aspects of my life.

In conclusion, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s legacy continues to inspire me as an American Sikh motivating me to contribute to a more welcoming, inclusive world.
